About the presentation:

Learning abilities and differences result from a complex interaction of genetics, brain development, and a child's experiences at home and school. We will explore this "nature-nurture" interaction in some of the variations—such as dyslexia, ADHD, and autistic spectrum disorders—which cause problems with academic, emotional, and social learning. We will also address the needs of gifted learners, along with practical solutions to the challenges faced by parents and educators of gifted children. Participants will learn why your genes are not necessarily your destiny, and why "different" brains often hold important talents. We will emphasize strategies for creating successful learning environments to benefit all children.
